

Although we have not steadily had school for these last few weeks, I have still made progress. I am nearly ready to publish an essay on why I believe privacy, a troublingly declining trait in the developed world, should be a basic human right. I have also began planning two possible essays that could be my next topic, either on why I believe veganism is not only morally but pragmatically the best course of action for humanity or on the idea of ethics as a commodity. I have been making steady progress on writing these essays and have been greatly enjoying my Ingenuity project as it gives me a way to express myself in a more permanent way than just in conversation with others.
