

These past weeks I have been working on what is going to turn out being a collection of essays on veganism. My initial plan was to create one unified essay that would discuss why veganism is the proper choice from three different perspectives, however as I began working, I quickly found that I had far more to say about each topic than I had anticipated. Because of this, I think I will ultimately post three separate essays on the three different perspectives and then finally one that merges all three of those writings together, to make them either more digestible or more comprehensive depending on the reader's choice. I had a lot of fun researching the three perspectives, environmentalism, health and ethics through these weeks and I plan to publish the part on ethics fairly soon; I am particularly excited for this one because it contains a formal logic argument for both the morality of animals and why you should be vegan based on that morality inside of it, something which I have not used before.

